THE UNIVERSITY OF PENNSYLVANIA HISTORICAL SKETCH

The first movement, which, being continued, developed into the University of Pennsylvania, was begun in Philadelphia in 1740.

At the close of the year 1739 there arrived in Philadelphia on the way to his parish at Savannah, Ga., the Reverend George Whitefield, then but twenty-four years of age, although his powers of preaching much exceeded his brethren of the Episcopal Church. Franklin was attracted by his eloquence and wrote to a friend, "I knew him intimately for upwards of thirty years. His integrity, disinterestedness, and indefatigable zeal in prosecuting every good work, I have never seen equalled, and shall never see excelled." He adds that Whitefield used sometimes to pray for his conversion, "but never had the satisfaction of believing that his prayers were heard."

Very soon Whitefield was prohibited from preaching in Christ Church, and the crowds which assembled to hear him were too great for any house in the city, so that a movement was set on foot to provide a building which would accommodate the people and protect them from the weather. Franklin was foremost in the work, and tells us that sufficient sums were soon received to procure the ground on Fourth near Arch Streets, and to erect the building which was 100 feet long and 70 broad, "about the size of Westminster Hall." The work was carried on with such spirit that Whitefield preached in it in November, 1740. There was another purpose which the trustees of this building had in mind and which appears in their advertisement in July of 1740, where they say it is "for a charity school for the instruction of poor children, gratis, in useful literature and the knowledge of the Christian religion." Whitefield was chosen to select the master and mistress of this school and children of both sexes were admitted. The clause quoted was incorporated word for word in the deed to the Trustees of the Academy of 1749 and connects the University with the origin of 1740.

Franklin's first proposal for a "compleat education of youth" was mentioned in 1743, but it was not until November 13, 1749, soon after the publication of a pamphlet written by Benjamin Franklin, and entitled "Proposals relating to the Education of Youth in Pensilvania," that twenty-four public-spirited citizens of Philadelphia associated themselves for the purpose of establishing an Academy, and "laying a Foundation for Posterity to erect a Seminary of Learning more extensive and suitable to their future Circumstances." One of their first acts was to negotiate for the possession of the building constructed under the trust established in 1740, and intended to be used for a "Charity School" and as a "House of Publick Worship." The Trustees conveyed it on February 1, 1750, to the Trustees of the Academy by an Indenture, which bound the latter to place, erect, found, establish, or keep a "House of Publick Worship" and also a free school for the instruction, teaching, and education of poor children or scholars, and which further provided that they "shall have full power to found, erect, establish and continue in and upon the said house and premises such another school, Academy, college, or other seminary of learning" as should not conflict with the original objects of the elder trust. The original Trustees also maintained and enlarged the movement of 1740 by contributing generously to the funds of the new management. Under these agreements—which in due time were faithfully fulfilled—the Trustees of the Academy took possession of the "New Building," as it was then called, fitted it up for its enlarged uses, engaged a rector and subordinate instructors, and formally opened the Academy in the presence of a distinguished company on January 7, 1751. So successful was the undertaking that in 1753 the Trustees secured a charter for the Academy from Thomas Penn and Richard Penn, proprietaries and governors-in-chief of the Province of Pennsylvania.

Under the skillful training of the learned Rev. William Smith, M.A., the highest class in this Academy attained that proficiency which, in a college course, would entitle it to a degree. Accordingly, two years later, the Proprietaries were again successfully petitioned to convert the Academy into a College with the power of conferring collegiate degrees. Dr. Smith was appointed the first Provost of the College and Academy, and the Reverend Francis Alison, M.A., the first Vice-Provost.

The first Commencement was held on May 17, 1757, when Paul Jackson, Jacob Duche, Francis Hopkinson, Samuel Magaw, Hugh Williamson, James Latta, and John Morgan received the degree of Bachelor of Arts.

In the agitated times that followed, during the wars with the French, the Provost, Dr. Smith, opposed so vehemently the non-resistance policy of the Legislature of Pennsylvania that by an arbitrary stretch of power he was thrown into prison. In faithfulness to his duties as Provost, however, he received his classes in gaol, and continued his instructions to them there while still a prisoner. Finally he was set at liberty, for the purpose of going to England to make a personal appeal to the king, and his kindly reception there was not lessened by the strain to which his loyalty at home had been put. Oxford conferred on him the degree of Doctor Divinity.

During the Revolution, the College fell upon troublous days. The gathering patriot troops used the college yard and buildings for temporary barracks; the attention of the students was diverted by more stirring interests; and finally the British troops came to occupy the city. As a result, the college building was closed for more than a year and a half, as far as its legitimate uses were concerned, though it served various purposes in the meantime, including that of the meeting place for Congress in July, 1778.

The years following the Revolution and the early part of the succeeding century were not a period conducive to the prosperity of a non-sectarian institute of higher education in a community as much devoted to material interests as was Pennsylvania. The Medical School, which had been founded in 1765, and which appealed to tangible professional interests, like those colleges which prepared students especially for the ministry, grew and flourished. It soon became by far the best-known medical school in America, drawing students by the hundreds from all parts of the country, especially from the Southern States. The founding of the Law School in 1790 was also an important step in the enlargement of the functions of the University, and these two schools were the first of their kind on the Continent, thus constituting Pennsylvania the first University in America.

The old buildings at Fourth and Arch Streets eventually became too contracted and too badly situated for further usefulness, and the minds of the Trustees were turned toward the securing of a new location. On Ninth Street, between Market and Chestnut, there was a large and handsome building erected at the expense of the state as a dwelling place for the President of the United States, when it was expected that Philadelphia would remain the national capital. But destiny chose a far different spot for the White House, and the Philadelphia presidential mansion remained untenanted. In 1802 this building was secured for the College, which immediately emigrated thither from its old Fourth Street home. Alterations and additions were made from time to time, till in 1829 it was torn down and two buildings were put up on the same site, one for the Department of Arts, one for the Medical School. In 1825 the college course was raised from three to four years, entrance requirements made more rigorous, and then, or not long previously, a rule was made that students should not be admitted under fourteen years of age.

With the middle of the century, a number of scientific courses in the College were successively established, additional members were added to the faculty, and several professors of strong personality and influence were teaching simultaneously.

A few years later, in 1872, a great break with the past was made by the removal from the center of the city to West Philadelphia. This proved to be the beginning of a new life, especially as it coincided with the administration of a new Provost, Dr. Stillé. What the Fourth Street location had become by 1802, the Ninth Street site had become in 1872. It had come to be surrounded and hemmed in by the world of business. In West Philadelphia the University had elbow-room, and it began promptly to take advantage of its opportunity for expansion. In the years immediately succeeding was erected the original group of four buildings, consisting of College Hall, Medical Hall, the Medical Laboratory, and the University Hospital. All these buildings were of green serpentine stone.

Between 1880 and 1890, during Dr. Pepper's provostship, several more buildings were erected, among these the Library, the present Botanical Building, and the old Veterinary buildings, which have since given way to the new Medical laboratories erected in 1904. Between 1890 and 1900, the additions to the University group of buildings included the Observatory, the beginning of the Dormitory system, the Harrison Laboratory of Chemistry, the Museum, Wistar Institute, Houston Hall, Dental Hall, and the Law School. During this period the direction of the University passed from Dr. Pepper to Charles Custis Harrison, LL.D., whose term of office as Provost dated from 1894 to 1910, Vice-Provost Edgar F. Smith, Sc.D., LL.D., succeeding him in office.

Since 1900 the physical equipment of the University has been materially augmented, the erection of the following buildings attesting a period of remarkable development and extension: the new Medical laboratories, already referred to; the Engineering Building; the Veterinary Hall and Hospital; the Gymnasium; the Training House and Franklin Field; the remodeling of the University Hospital; enlargement of the Museum of Science and Art; additions to the Dormitories; the Thomas W. Evans Museum and the School of Dentistry; the Women's Dormitory; the Henry W. Phipps Institute for the Study, Prevention and Treatment of Tuberculosis; and the University Settlement House. The new building for the Graduate School will shortly be constructed, a site for the Wharton School building has been chosen, and the Provost's House will soon be ready for his occupancy. In addition, the University has acquired, by grant from the city, a neighboring tract of about fifty acres, which extends the campus to the western edge of the Schuylkill River, and gives it a total acreage of one hundred and seventeen, exclusive of streets and sidewalks.

But after all, the campus and buildings are only the shell of the University. It is the history of the life within them which is important. During the period from 1870 to 1916, a number of new departments of study were established, in the scientific courses, in Biology, in Finance and Economy, in Architecture, in Dentistry, in Music, in Veterinary Medicine, in the Graduate School, and in the Education and Pharmacy, in addition to corresponding extensions of the old departments, the College, and the Medical and Law Schools; the separation of the Wharton School and the Towne Scientific School from the College in 1912 was an important administrative change, and the merger of the Medico-Chirurgical and the Jefferson Medical Colleges with the University's Medical School insures the pre-eminence of Philadelphia as the Medical center of the United States. The number of students in all departments had risen from less than a thousand in 1870 to 9,000 in 1916-1917, and the number of instructors from less than fifty to more than seven hundred. Representatives from every state of the Union and forty-one foreign countries are included in the student enrollment.

A parallel movement has been the growth of a series of connections between the University and the community at large. For instance, between 1883 and 1887, a commission of members of the Faculty and of the Board of Trustees carried out a series of investigations in modern spiritualism and published their results. During the same period, Mr. Eadweard Muybridge anticipated the invention of the commercialized moving picture by performing, under the supervision of the University, a system of experiments on the photography of animals in motion. The publication of the results of his experiments furnishes a valuable and interesting document in the history of the development of the motion picture. The Babylonian explorations, which have since made valuable contributions to the world's knowledge of ancient history, were begun at about the same time. The Museum of Art and Science, in which the Babylonian collection and other valuable collections are exhibited, is now the Mecca of week-end pilgrimages of school children and others throughout the year. The free clinics in the Medical, Dental, and Veterinary Schools annually provide treatment for thousands of the city's sufferers. The Phipps Institute for the Study, Prevention, and Treatment of Tuberculosis is also a splendid instance of the double function of the University. The work of the Psychological Clinic, in studying and treating backward and defective children, is rapidly becoming recognized as an important adjunct to the community. Instances multiply in which the various laboratories of Medicine, Botany, Zoölogy, Physics, and Engineering have been drawn upon by national, state, or municipal bureaus for expert assistance. Each year one or more commissions, such as the Chestnut Blight Commission, make the University a headquarters for research work. In a similar way, the various departments of the Wharton School of Finance and Commerce have given practical and valuable assistance in the solving of problems affecting national and municipal finances and administration. The solution of many of the perplexing questions of policy, arising out of the construction of the Panama Canal, was achieved by members of the Wharton School faculty. The unexcelled Department of Architecture also, through its students and faculty, has rendered efficient aid to many municipalities. The free public lectures on Saturday afternoons by distinguished members of the faculty are attended by thousands of persons every year. In many other ways does the University respond to requests for expert assistance.

College athletics have formed such a large part of the interests of students, alumni, and outsiders in recent years, and Pennsylvania has won so prominent an intercollegiate position, that it is hard to realize how short their period of development has been. Rowing and cricket run far back in the last century, but in other branches there was little done before 1875. Contests in baseball were begun in that year, in football in 1876, and in track athletics in 1877. The Athletic Association was formed in 1873, and has guided and controlled athletics ever since. The first regular athletic field, now the site of the Dormitories, was obtained in 1885, and the present

Franklin Field in 1895. From the later eighties onward, Pennsylvania began to develop winning teams in various athletic lines, and her recent triumphs are a familiar matter.

The more purely social side of university life goes further back, and has been less changed of recent years, than the intellectual or the athletic sides. Fraternities, musical and dramatic clubs, college literary societies, and such organizations have their roots well back in the early part of the last century. However, the custom of keeping up fraternity houses in which members live while at college has sprung up within the last twenty years. Many attractive houses have recently been built by local chapters of national societies.

But of all the changes that have taken place in the life of students of the University since 1872, when the removal to West Philadelphia was made, the most important, if not the most conspicuous, is the greater closeness of connection of the students with the University, the large part of their life which centers in it. This has resulted partly from the erection of the Dormitories, partly from the establishment of Houston Hall, in which practically all the students meet one another and spend much of their time, partly also from the policy of the University authorities, and the growth of a habit among the students of looking upon the University as the center of all their interests. Twenty-five years ago the greater number of the students had but little more connection than that involved in attendance during lecture or recitation hours. It has since then become more and more general for a student to feel during the three or four years of his course that all his interests, material, intellectual, social, and religious, gather around his university. There he spends almost all of his time, and there he finds enough to satisfy all his normal instincts and interests.

The seventy buildings of the University are nearly all situated on rising ground west of the Schuylkill River, and within ten minutes' ride of City Hall, in the heart of Philadelphia. They are grouped on one tract of one hundred and seventeen acres, and thus secure the advantages of college life and fellowship for the students of all departments, a unique feature.

The advantages of the University's location in Philadelphia are manifold. The city is one of the oldest and largest on the continent, and is well described as the "City of Homes." The privileges which the student obtains toward a liberal education are very valuable. In music he can attend the performances of Grand Opera by the Metropolitan Opera Company and the Symphony Concerts of the Philadelphia Orchestra. In art the advantages of the Academy of the Fine Arts and of Memorial Hall are open to him, as well as many other features valuable to students of architecture. The situation of the various Engineering departments in the principal manufacturing city of the nation is obvious, as well as the advantage to the Wharton School of such an industrial center where the problems of business management can be shown in a practical way. The various institutions for the care of the dependent classes are also valuable to the study of social and economic problems. The Courts and the Hospitals are indispensable to the thorough work of the Law and Medical Schools. And yet the scholar or lover of literature who would seek to step aside from the immediate can readily find seclusion and monastic quiet within the limits of the University, situated as it is on the west bank of the Schuylkill, and so just removed from the city's turmoil. One has but to take oneself within the enclosures of the Dormitories, the bosky limits of the Botanical Gardens, or to stroll along Hamilton Walk, with its ample shrubbery and poplar sentinels, to find the blessings of solitude.

The name of the institution by which it has been conferred follows the academic degree. The omission of it indicates that the degree was given by the University of Pennsylvania.

A star (*) after a name denotes that the individual is deceased. In every case in which the year of the decease is known it is indicated at the right.

When an address appears in parentheses it denotes that it is the last known address.

College

The College Department grew out of the "Charity School" founded in 1740 and originally included most of the courses now given excepting Law, Medical, Dental, Veterinary and Graduate School. In 1912 the Towne Scientific School and the Wharton School of Finance and Commerce were separated from the College Department, having been organized with their own faculty and dean. The Evening School was established in 1904 as a part of the Wharton School. The College Department offers courses in Arts and Sciences, Biology, Music, and also has under its jurisdiction a College Course for Teachers and a Summer School. The Evening School leads to a Cert. of Prof. The Summer School does not grant either a degree or a certificate. All the other courses lead to the degrees of A. B.; B. S.; B. Mus.; B. S. in Biology; also Cert. of Prof.

Wharton School

This School established in 1881, was affiliated with the College Department until 1912 when it was organized as a separate department. It was originally known as the Wharton School of Finance and Economy, but Economy was dropped from the title and Commerce substituted. The Evening School of Finance and Accounts was added to the Wharton School while Wharton was yet a part of the College and it is, since 1912 still a part of Wharton. The Evening School grants a Cert. of Prof. and Wharton grants a B. S. in Econ.
